Monday Night's Tragedy.

The Coroner's jury did not return a verdict yesterday in the case of the young man who was run over and killed in the Maine Central yard, Monday night. But little testimony was introduced, it being confined to the statements of the train men who picked the unfortunate man up after the cars passed over him. The Coroner adjourned the inquest until this morning, when, we understand, it is hoped additional evidence may be found to throw more light on the matter. The investigation should be a searching one. The advocates of the saloons, anxious to relieve this illegal traffic from the terrible responsibility of answering for one more life, says that testimony was introduced at the inquest showing that the unfortunate man was not under the influence of liquor. There was no testimony on this subject whatever at the inquest yesterday, but three witnesses being examined, all employes of the road, who were running the train at the time. If the unfortunate man was not under the influence of liquor how did he get under the wheels of that train which was running at the rate of only four miles an hour? Is it not right to infer that had the man been standing up on the track when the train approached, the men whose duty it is to keep a lookout would have seen him before the cars struck him? This is a question to be solved by the Coroner's jury who are investigating the causes that lead to his death. We believe it should be made clear in the verdict. Every one knows that the man was killed by the cars and so far as we can learn, no one attaches blame to the road. But the responsibility for this death should be fixed. If this man was under the influence of liquor, and we were informed by reliable authority that the odor of liquor was very perceptible upon his breath, then let that fact be known and this sad tragedy laid at the door of the saloons where it belongs. The Coroner and good and true citizens who have been summoned to investigate this matter will doubtless go to the bottom of it before they return a verdict in order that the causes leading to the terrible death may be made perfectly clear to the public mind.

Sympathy for Mr. Blaine.

[Wash. Cor. Boston Journal, Jan. 19.]

Secretary Blaine returned from Oak Hill Cemetery as soon as his son's body was interred, and after passing a few minutes in his library rode out as far as the Soldiers' Home. As soon as he returned he took up the routine work of the State Department with Mr. Dent, his secretary, and continued business until dinner was served. During the dinner hour the walk very bright and labored hard to give a key note to cheerfulness to all around his hospitable table. As soon as the cloth was removed his son Emmons joined him in the reception room and they remained in close conference an hour or more. Mr. Blaine told one of his personal friends that he should bring James, his son, to his home for such assistance as he could render him there. The Secretary added that he should go to his department on Monday morning and take up at once the thread of his work, although it would be with a heavy heart, "but," said Mr. Blaine, "the head of a household must set the example that he wishes followed."

Two communications received by Mr. Blaine were especially gratifying at this time. The first was from the British Legation and was this:

[Personal.]
BRITISH LEGATION,
WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan 1890.

Dear Mr. Blaine:

A telegram arrived last night from Lord Salisbury requesting me to convey to you his sincere condolence on the sad event of which I had given him the first sorrowful tidings. Reluctant as I feel to intrude upon you, even for such a purpose, today, I have thought it best to deliver the message without further delay.

I remain yours, very sincerely,
JULIAN PAUNCEFOTE.

The Hon J. G. Blaine, etc., etc.

The other message came under the ocean but from a man known and respected in every land where the English language is spoken:

LONDON, Jan. 13, 1890

J. G. Blaine, Washington, D. C.:

Let me offer my respectful and sincere sympathy in the midst of your deep affliction. I received from your dear son when in America so many acts of friendliness and courtesy that I shall ever cherish his memory.
HENRY IRVING.

This morning Mr. Blaine showed the effect of his severe strain, and had the absent and distracted appearance that was noticeable on Thursday. As time progressed, however, he became more himself and had a pleasant interview with Mr. T. Jefferson Coolidge, of Boston, who called about 11.

Emmons Blaine has attended to every domestic demand made upon the family and thought he should return to Baltimore this afternoon.

Mrs. Blaine responded to an inquiry for her health to the effect that she was as well as she could hope to be. By to-morrow everything in the stricken home will take its normal appearance, and while the vacant chair will recall the brief and happy life that has so untimely ended, the sorrow will not be allowed to conflict with life's duties.

Sympathy for Blaine.
